In the course of his testimony, Judge Brett Kavanaugh offered, on three separate occasions, what could be described as an unqualified admission that sexual assault survivors often suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). "And one of the main reasons I went back to law school," Kavanaugh told the Senate Judiciary Committee, "was because I was traumatized by an experience I had in high school that I experienced many years later, for example in Yale Law School, where one of the main cases that I was reading was about the development of PTSD. I had PTSD in my formative years and it was so severe, I'm not saying that every one of the more than 60 people that I knew 1d6a3396d6

His aunt sent him from London and has treated him very well. He would have stayed in London only for his father's illness and the conduct of the London tradesmen. The double-seater was to have been done soon after our arrival. When at last we come, I shall arrange to have a suite of rooms in the side wing which would be ready for us. It would be better for me to have this done before I become used to London again, for if I had a sudden fear of being alone in the house, it would be much better to have a double-seater there where I could feel that I was not alone. So many strange things have happened to me in London. I have been poisoned twice in the very same day, and my nerves have got terribly strung
