Google, as usual, is the leading beneficiary of competition in the tech industry. Its Android platform stands out as the one that's best suited to devices that will run on many different types of hardware. The fact that it's free is also great. Apple? Apple's iPhone platform, as limited as it is, is the only one that forces hardware manufacturers to create phones on a single platform. And Apple likes the lock-in that keeping iPhone users to its platform gives. Microsoft's Nadella: As CEO, Microsoft's leader should be acting like a person who wants to see Windows become irrelevant. But instead, he's in the odd position of having the same leadership he accuses Google of having, by virtue of his job title. The only difference is that he hasn't actually demonstrated he wants to do the right thing, whereas the leader at Google has. If you're not familiar with how Microsoft's smartphone strategy has been playing out, here's how it happened: Microsoft's Windows Mobile platform disappeared in 2008. Microsoft's Xbox gaming platform wasn't a major player in smartphones until 2010 with the release of its first phone, the Nokia Lumia 710. Microsoft released its Windows Phone 7 operating system in 2010, and its Windows Phone 7.8 operating system in 2011. It's probably possible to defend Microsoft's iPhone-like approach as rational. In the past, building and releasing the latest version of its Windows operating system (7, 8, 10) has helped Microsoft's platform stand out, which is in the company's interest. But taking this approach carries risks, as Google's failure to release Android updates has shown. Even though Microsoft initially set out to be the iPhone of mobile operating systems, it's clear that Microsoft 6d1f23a050
